This article conceptually presents challenges and recommendations for providing appropriate care to Nursing Home residents during the COVID-19 pandemic. However, it is excessively abstract. In fact, there is a wealth of existing research in this field, and introducing more specific cases could strengthen the discussion. Moreover, the issues faced in delivering suitable care to Nursing Home residents may vary across regions due to demographic characteristics and differences in healthcare and social welfare systems. International readers may be well-informed about the challenges in their own regions, but they might not be aware of the issues faced in other areas. Gaining knowledge about these differences could offer them a new perspective. Unfortunately, the authors did not achieve that in this article.
