

Review of: "Empowering Minds: The Evolution of Higher Education in Tamil Nadu towards Innovation and Excellence"

David Yeret Rodríguez-Salazar¹

¹ Universidad Señor de Sipán

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

The article "Empowering Minds: The Evolution of Higher Education in Tamil Nadu towards Innovation and Excellence" has a clear and well-organized structure, but improvements can be made to its content. First, the title of the article is vague and does not clearly reflect the main focus of the manuscript. In addition, the article should provide more context and background information on the topic of mental health among young people in higher education, and provide more evidence to support the claims made in the manuscript. It would also be desirable to develop more information on the role of educators when addressing the issue of mental health among young people in higher education. Another important observation is that one of the reviewers has detected that the article has 75% of being generated by artificial intelligence, so it would be necessary to review the joint paper and make sure that it was written by the authors to have more credibility and authenticity of the article. In addition, the article should provide more specific recommendations to address the issue of mental health among young people in higher education, and provide more information on potential challenges and barriers to implementing the recommendations made in the manuscript. Finally, the article should provide more information on the potential benefits of addressing mental health among young people in higher education, and how this may translate into broader social and economic benefits.