

Review of: "Soccer fans, stadium attendance, and interpersonal trust in the Mexican population"

Gerrard Mugford¹

¹ Universidad de Guadalajara

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

An extremely interesting study with a clear research question and follow-up research. The research purpose was achieved and discussed and hopefully further research can go into greater detail and examine other aspects of the co-construction of social capital. The interrelationship between social capital and football soccer fans offers a wide range of research themes and topics and interpersonal trust is obviously an important area of study.

I think that greater implications could have been drawn from the study with respect to Mexican society and other areas worthy of research and investigation.

I would have liked to have seen more detail regarding the participants e.g. how they were contacted and selected.

I think an introductory paragraph to the article would have been useful to orient the reader(s) rather than just delving into social capital.