

Review of: "International Education and the Crises of Cosmopolitanism and Global Citizenship"

Cathryn MacCallum

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

An interesting paper, bringing together a range of thoughts and perspectives on this important and timely topic.

It covers much of the literature around global citizenship and cosmopolitanism, presenting a coherent review of academic thinking. This would benefit from inclusion of some more current perspectives from the likes of Bourn and Pashby.

The links between education and colonialism are very valid, however would be strengthened with inclusion of Development Education which, as a movement, gave rise to many of the current notions of global citizenship, was grounded in post colonialism and critique of the neoliberal agendas that continue to shape education priorities.

A stronger focus on Southern voices are also an area that the paper would also benefit from, through bringing in Salah on decolonialising curricula and also Swansons writings on Ubuntu and Global Citizenship.

Finally interesting that both Naussbaum and Sen are mentioned but the importance they attribute to values, freedoms, agency and capabilities would provide an timely lens to further explore notions of global citizenship and cosmopolitanism