The research paper offers a thorough examination of Indian culture and the Arranged Marriage System, with a specific focus on partner preferences, arranged marriages, and online dating applications. The components of this work encompass lucid writing, an extensive examination of existing literature, meticulous research techniques, and direct personal engagements. Nevertheless, the study is flawed due to its limited sample size, failure to account for social stigma, and neglect of demographic characteristics. The findings may have implications for metropolitan areas, but they may not be applicable to rural India. The writers also neglect to acknowledge constraints and uncritically incorporate participant comments. The study provides unique insights into the social and demographic characteristics, partner preferences, and experiences of individuals who use matrimonial websites in India. Nevertheless, by acknowledging and rectifying these constraints and integrating recommended enhancements, the overall impact of this research could be significantly augmented in terms of comprehending this subject matter.
