

Review of: "International Education and the Crises of Cosmopolitanism and Global Citizenship"

Anindita Shome

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

I found the article to have a good scope in understanding the increasingly interconnected, global world in the contemporary times. A deeper analysis into the workings of capitalism and capitalist structures in controlling the narratives of what is cosmopolitan and global in IE (International Education), which, in turn, accepts or rejects students from the sphere of global and cosmopolitan education, could enrich the study. One of the strengths of the articles, according to me, is the possibility of educational spaces as the creator of global citizens, solidarities, and empathy. With the flow of international students changing the dynamics of the education system, I believe, this study will add to our understanding of education and global spaces.