This article by Brendon Carmody is a model of excellent writing and scholarship as it applies the work of Bernard Lonergan to Catholic Education to make it more inclusive containing both the scientific and the confessional. My one comment is that there are no references to the field of holistic education or conceptions of holistic education as presented in the International Handbook of Holistic Education. Carmody needs to clarify his use of the term holistic. If it is used just within the context of Lonergan's writing in integrating the scientific with the confessional, then that should be made clear as opposed to linking Lonergan's theory to broader conceptions of holistic education.
