The paper raises interesting issues in global geopolitics, and while the problem of food security is vital, more so is the work of recognising humanity as a whole. We are not yet citizens of the world, and it is urgent that this happens. We must take care of the world's water reserves, make international agreements to decontaminate water sources, and give assistance to the least developed countries for the cultivation of food. Another important aspect is to understand that the care of the land is fundamental for the development of any global public policy that allows the generation of food for the population. In that sense, it is also functional to understand that war is a process that is not very acceptable but has always occurred in the world; the important thing is to minimise the effects of war on populations until humanity can mature and resolve geopolitical issues through dialogue and reason.

I would suggest working on environmental accounting and the impact of food distribution in cities by minimising waste and ensuring the distribution of surpluses to the most vulnerable populations. Too much is thrown away, and what is left over is not distributed in the cities.
