

Review of: "The Role of Personal Traits in Financing Decisions: Emotional Biases as a Mediating Variable – An Empirical Study of a Sample of French Companies"

Sheetal Thomas¹

¹ Charotar University of Science and Technology

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

In reviewing the research work, it's evident that the clarity and coherence in thought have been effectively established. The limitations of the study, particularly in relation to the explanatory and mediating variables, are well articulated. The mention of a plan to integrate other variables, including the impact of governance on performance, as well as the acknowledgment of potential external influences on financing decisions, demonstrates a clear and insightful approach. However, further elaboration on how these limitations may have affected the outcomes would enhance the clarity of thought.

The depth of the literature review is commendable, with a wide range of references from various reputable sources cited to support the study's contextual framework. The inclusion of recent and relevant references, such as those related to the role of emotional intelligence and personality traits in decision-making, is particularly noteworthy and contributes to the thoroughness of the literature review.

Regarding the methodology, while the plan to compare the study's results with those from other countries and the proposal for a longitudinal study are ambitious and promising, a more detailed explanation of the specific methodology to be employed would enhance the rigor of the study. Additionally, a clearer articulation of the measures to be used in assessing personality traits and emotional intelligence would further strengthen the methodology.

In terms of the conclusion, the researchers' recognition of the need for future research in areas such as the effectiveness of interventions to improve emotional intelligence and the long-term consequences of funding decisions based on personality traits is appropriate. This demonstrates an apt awareness of the implications and potential for further exploration in the field.

Overall, this research work exhibits commendable clarity and coherence in thought, a comprehensive literature review, and promising avenues for future research. However, adding further detail on the methodology would enhance the rigor and reliability of the study.