In order to classify the present article as a scientific article, it requires a clear scientific structure. Furthermore, the paper does not fully meet content-related scientific criteria, such as proper citation and substantiation of statements.

Especially at the beginning of the article, the problem situation, objective, and structure of the article are not sufficiently clearly stated. Only on this basis can the article pursue an adequate theoretical-empirical and methodological argumentation, in order to present innovative and scientifically well-founded results.

These results should be critically reflected in accordance with relevant quality criteria, in order to finally conclude the article with a summary and outlook.
