The points this study is trying to clarify are fully understandable. The review has been done carefully, and the direction of the research is generally appropriate. However, I do not understand why Orchard Road was chosen as the subject of the experiment. Orchard Road is a shopping street and an environment designed for people to walk. There are far too many factors that make walking enjoyable, such as the various stores and street trees, rather than climatic factors, so I question whether it is an appropriate subject for this analysis. It seems difficult to find a correlation between the willingness to walk and climatic factors.
