This is a very novel topic for discussion, and authors have done a good job elaborating the nuances of Covid-19 pandemic in Sub-Saharan African region. However, I feel that authors can broaden the scope of topic by explaining a little more about the politics of the region to place the argument regarding separation of science and politics in context. Secondly, it would be better if you can elaborate on the specific vulnerabilities that people faced during the pandemic with special references to marginalized groups such as women. Thirdly, authors argue for the reevaluation of the stay at home policy of the government, but I would appreciate if authors could analytically stipulate why they have come to this conclusion and what could be the alternative strategy keeping in mind the socio-economic structure of the region.
