The scientific background of this review is the field of food security, with a focus on the ethical and geopolitical context of global food security policy. The author, Vojtěch Mašek, is affiliated with the CREATE project at the University of Hradec Králové in the Czech Republic and has expertise in the areas of ethics, geopolitics, human rights, and international cooperation.

The main result of this manuscript is a critical commentary on the final version of the report "Collective Action for Ending a Collective Problem: A Multi-stakeholder Project on Global Food Security." The author offers a detailed analysis of the ethical and geopolitical aspects of global food security policy, providing valuable insights and raising important questions about the report's content and its implications in the current historical context.

This review can be considered a scientific work as it provides a critical analysis of a report on global food security policy, drawing on the author's expertise in ethics, geopolitics, human rights, and international cooperation.

I have a few questions:

- What are the potential impacts of multi-stakeholder approaches on global food security, and how can the risks and responsibilities be effectively shared among stakeholders from different spheres of society?
- How can the ethical and geopolitical aspects of food security be addressed in the current tense historical context, especially in light of open wounds such as geopolitical conflicts and humanitarian crises?
