This is a well-written and important discussion of the enactive cognitive approach and the application of this approach to understand historical constitution and transformation of social reality. The article situates the analysis within important dimensions of social theory and environmental evolutionary philosophy. The authors propose a good and convincing theoretical heterogeneity, and the 4E cognitive paradigm plays an important role in understanding enactive cognition in interaction with the environment. I can recommend this article to scholars who want to understand the relation between subjectivity and intersubjectivity in constitution of the environment.
