

Review of: "[Commentary] Global Governance and Sustainable Development: Lessons from the COVID-19 Pandemic"

Meghadri Das¹

¹ Indian Institute of Engineering Science and Technology, Shibpur

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

A detailed and analytical examination of the COVID-19 pandemic's effects on authoritarian and democratic regimes is presented in the article, with particular attention paid to problems like growing economic disparities and prejudice against minorities. It gives insightful information about the difficulties these governments encountered throughout the pandemic.

1. First off, the theory relies heavily on criticizing capitalist structures, although at times it seems to be coming from a single point of view. Without thoroughly examining their potential advantages or how they may be modified to support more equal and sustainable results rather than being completely overhauled, the conversation frequently concentrates primarily on the drawbacks of capitalist systems. By taking into account both the benefits and drawbacks of capitalist frameworks, a more balanced discussion could enhance the book. Could you elaborate on the advantages of capitalist systems in particular and talk about potential sustainability adjustments?
2. No mathematical tools are used. The use of statistical charts and graphs is useful to understand the matter.
3. Although the study calls for systemic improvements, it lacks specific recommendations on how those changes may be practically carried out. The paper's practical relevance—especially for policymakers and practitioners—would be greatly enhanced by including more specific examples and a more detailed roadmap for these transitions.
4. Finally, the manuscript's primary focus is on socioeconomic inequality in Western countries, which may limit the global application of its results. Incorporating case studies and data from many countries across continents would broaden the discussion's reach and make the proposed solutions more relevant in different socioeconomic circumstances.