The article presents a very interesting and relevant topic for our cities. It is crucial that our cities' design and form provide the basis for improving both cycling and walkability. I really enjoyed reading the article, and the results do, in fact, contribute to a better understanding of the willingness to walk and the contributions that city planners can have.

My only less positive comment is regarding the references. There are some assumptions made that should not only be fact-checked but also referenced. There is (fortunately) a lot of research done and being developed in this specific subject. In order to provide new studies and new guidelines for the future of urban design, it is important to understand what has been done before. Thus, this is my only suggestion: improve the references and the context of the research.
