I find this work very interesting, as it can certainly guide other students on what type of questions professors can ask during the defense of their Doctoral Thesis and how students should respond.

However, I think what is presented is a bit simple.

Why and on what basis is it determined that the candidate successfully answered?

In my opinion, an analysis of each response should be incorporated to ensure that they are well constructed and that provide relevant information regarding what is being asked.

I think that we cannot make claims that something is correct without scientific evidence if we want to be rigorous.
