

Review of: "Integrating Community Service in Language Education: Fostering Social Change via Inclusive and Transformative Learning Experiences"

Jenny Bossaller<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> University of Missouri - Columbia

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

The title is promising, but there seems to be a lot of jargon in the text. It is a literature review, but I can't tell how the researcher found the articles. I would begin by stating the search parameters if this is a structured literature review (what databases were used, and what terms, for example). The abstract needs work - for instance, what does "Digital identities and multilearning communities have the potential..." mean? And the next sentence, too - not even sure what that is referring to. The concepts need to be defined in the paper. At the same time, it looks like this could possibly be developed into a good literature review, but make sure that the papers that you're referring to are about language learning or closely related subjects; they are really wide-ranging. What level of students is this about? University or below? Online teaching or in-person? Provide a background for the paper and a problem statement. It isn't a thorough examination and integration of community service into language instruction to promote social change, as is - keep going!