While the goal is noteworthy, the article lacks depth and rigor. Regarding the first, merely mapping disadvantages is not sufficient to get interesting insights on how geographic and socioeconomic dimensions intersect, leading to clusters of socio-spatial marginalization. Regarding the second, there are issues with references (many of which are not correctly made), and also with definitions: at not point it becomes clear what exactly is assessed by the multidimensional poverty index, and this would be crucial to even understand what exactly is being shown.
