It is very interesting to note how a simple case of crowding has been studied in detail in respect to various contradictory laws and judgements .

On one spectrum is the law to livelihood, and on the opposite spectrum is the safety and right to walk on the footpaths freely .

A small suggestion/correction is recommended. Under the news abstract, fourth line, street vends may be replaced with street vendors .

The research methodology is apt, and the aims and objectives have been meticulously thought out and framed well. The survey points have taken into account the importance of cleanliness and hygiene in the areas, more so where food is also being sold.

The results have been tabulated with appealing graphs, and they are easily comprehensible.

The discussion part has been articulated well and is in consonance with the research findings and results, and it also addresses the objectives as framed.

This case study can form the basis for study in many other such markets, and an overview of the entire country can be studied, and corrective measures can be instituted . This can be the way forward.

Overall, a well-researched and well-written article which is recommended to be published in indexed journals.
