

Review of: "Expectation of Life at Birth by Sex and Area of Residence in India and Bigger States/UT's (2013-2017): A Review"

Prakash Patel

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

There are some essential points that require attention before considering this article for publication.

The article primarily draws on data available in the NFHS reports and presents information without a comprehensive methodology. There seems to be a lack of in-depth analysis or critical examination of the available data. The title suggests a "review," but the content does not align with the typical structure and depth expected of a review article.

Moreover, the absence of references within the text and the limited scope for new insights or interpretations on the subject matter raise concerns about the novelty and contribution of this work to the existing literature.

I believe that for this article to make a meaningful contribution to the field, it would require a more robust methodology, deeper analysis, and the integration of existing literature to provide new insights or perspectives on the expectation of life at birth in India.

While the topic is crucial and pertinent, I would recommend further development and enhancement of this work to enrich its scholarly contribution.