This definition is a fair starting point but it doesnt mention many other social science disciplines nor the ones that straddle disciplinary boundaries. I wonder if it could be expanded, so adding at the end something along the lines of:

Anthropology is the study of human culture and society (overlapping with sociology), Education the study of forms and processes of learning, and Government how power is deployed. Other subjects include social science although some of their remit may fall outside the area. These include archaeology, law, business studies, development.
