Dear Editor,

The manuscript is clear, relevant for the field and presented in a well-structured manner. It addresses a pertinent issue in the academic world, specifically the challenges associated with achieving a high number of publications for career advancement. It highlights a common problem faced by academics.

The cited references are mostly recent publications (within the last 5 years), but it could insert references to relevant studies or reports on academic publishing practices would lend more credibility to the article.

The research lacks detailed theoretical framework, methodology, and analysis. The research without providing empirical evidence with supported data (primary or secondary).

The conclusions are consistent but could be more clear summarizing key points and emphasizing the importance of addressing these issues would enhance the overall impact of the article. The article doesn't explore the potential consequences of the proposed reforms on the academic community, and doesn't show the future work.

In conclusion the work is very interesting and the author should continue with this excellent research.
