This article tries to connect infrastructure projects with human rights as defined in Law 39/1999. However, this article could be enhanced by incorporating a more nuanced, case-specific analysis of the projects' direct impact on human rights, addressing the complexities and challenges of implementation in greater depth, and situating the Indonesian approach within the broader international human rights discourse. Furthermore, a more inclusive perspective that considers the views of affected communities and civil society, coupled with a detailed discussion of the mechanisms for accountability, transparency, and the monitoring and evaluation of these projects, would provide a more comprehensive and critical examination of the regulation's human rights implications.
