The article at hand offers a thought-provoking analysis of the prevailing trends in Corporate Social Responsibility (CSR) research within China. Nonetheless, it becomes apparent that certain typographical errors within the text might indicate a stage of preliminary development in this field. In light of this observation, I am inclined to recommend that the esteemed authors contemplate a comparative examination of CSR research trends in China and the Western sphere. Such an approach holds the potential to yield further captivating insights, thereby enhancing the depth and significance of the discourse surrounding CSR research.
