Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

The authors' main idea appears to be that the cultural practice of patriarchy, combined with authoritarian governments, reduces people's ability to have a reasonable life, where basic needs are met as well as the opportunity for thriving.

They propose a practical solution: educating humanity about what is a decent life. I could not determine whether the authors' educational ideas include helping people change the government, change other aspects of their lives.

One question: the United Nations has put forward declarations about universal human rights. One powerful statement is the rights of children. I ask the authors: how does your educational plan overlap with UN decrees?

Additional educational plans exist. One that I suggest is every child growing up in a privileged way (i.e., having basic needs met and opportunities in place to thrive) should be able to befriend a child, via computer, who is living a less advantaged life. Exposure to a privileged peer is a form education. AI tools can be used for translation; the children can share aspects of each other's language.
