One of the most interesting aspects of the paper is how it touches many different fields and show how urban solutions depend on series of factors and expertises such as health, urban planners and architects, environmental experts. Most importantly it shows how grassroots movements can make a difference when organized and aware of the issues that directly impact their communities. This said, I wished the paper had acknowledged some theoretical aspects linked to environmental justice and governance. It would be interesting to see if other places succeeded dealing with similar issues. Also add pictures from the expressway and surroundings before and after would be great. What is being done by the city to promote alternative ways to commute? What's the real estate impact of these interventions? Interesting article! Congrats.
