Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

I congratulate the author for selecting this topic, as it's critical to comprehend the function of cooperatives in rural communities. The study offers insightful information about how consumer cooperatives affect members' quality of life in a particular area. The study employs a mixed research methodology, integrating statistical analysis and descriptive research design to investigate a range of consumer cooperative topics, such as pricing methods, possibilities, obstacles, and product satisfaction.

Strengths: Finding the data to complete the research and identifying the gap are two of the paper's main points. The literature review also provides a solid foundation by citing relevant research on consumer cooperatives that has been done all over the world and setting it in the Ethiopian context.

Areas for Improvement: Since interviews were performed, I would suggest describing some of the components from the qualitative data and how they were analyzed. Additionally, I would propose rounding up the mean numbers to be more accurate.

In general, the paper has a clear structure and offers insight about the consumer cooperatives in Hawassa Zuria Woreda.
