Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

Will be nice to explain the reason of the chosen aim of the research in the abstract

The second, in related works you just wrote the short abstract of the sense of that works. Still don't know for what you did that.... You didn't raise problems, didn't highlight positive or negative aspects of the related works.

The third, seems it's a review work so the name of the article should be changed

The methodology appears to be well-structured, systematic, and comprehensive. It combines qualitative research methods with a clear search strategy and sample selection process. However, the evaluation of the methodology's effectiveness ultimately depends on the execution of the research and the quality of the sources reviewed.

It seems that the conclusion of the article is quite informative and covers key aspects of the importance of ICT resource management. However, here are a few possible ways to enhance the conclusion:

Specific Examples: Add specific examples or illustrations to support your claims and make the conclusion more concrete and persuasive.

Importance: Emphasize how crucial ICT resource management is for the success of organizations and businesses.

Perspectives: Consider how the importance and methods of ICT resource management may change in the future, especially in light of the mentioned technological changes and new challenges.

Call to Action: Conclude the article with a call to action or further research in the field to encourage readers to take action or explore this topic further.

Structure: Ensure that the conclusion has a logical structure and sequence that helps readers easily understand the key points.

Remember that the conclusion should be concise but informative, and it should address the main question of the article or provide readers with a clear understanding of the main findings of the article.
