The topic of the article is interesting in view of the possibility of assessing the interdependence of economies (especially in the conditions of an ongoing war) based on investments in research and development, or, more broadly, the state of intangible assets. The approach based on patent flows is quite interesting. I happened to see research that analyzed the innovativeness of the economy in this way.

As for Russia, in the conditions of an inevitable budget deficit, a worthless stock market, and a banking system in a state of final collapse, the interruption of such flows means the inevitable aging of company assets, and therefore, forcing peace. The author talks about 20 years, but such estimates are excessively pessimistic.

You can look even more broadly at this problem in terms of WARA - analysis, where the returns estimation of intangible assets has always remained the most significant problem (mainly based on experts' suggestions). And not only in such primitive markets as the Russian market, but also in developed markets. This mechanism for similar markets can be a development of this article.

Unfortunately, it is difficult to agree with the actual advice of the author regarding technological presence and waiting for changes in Russia. The lack of prospects for the emergence of both political institutions traditional for the Western world and institutions of the market economy turns such a prospect into a mirage. Global TNCs, entering the markets of totalitarian societies, agree to play the game imposed on them by such societies and according to their rules. If the author had in mind such a return after 20 years, then, as it turned out today, it is a source of permanent crises. To test this hypothesis, one can analyze the reasons for China's growth and current decline.

I thank the author for the raised topic and wish him success ...
