Overall, a good case report study. As mentioned in the article, the initial pathology report confirms that it was an epidermoid cyst without evidence of malignancy. The recurrence of the epidermoid cyst makes it unique. But since the initial surgery was performed when the cyst was infected, it leads to a question of incomplete removal during the first surgery, which might have contributed to the recurrence in 3 years. No mention of any imaging studies done, but typically not required, but maybe considered in extreme cases like this one. Also, mention of the patient's past medical history or any genetic disorders would have been nice to have, which may have predisposed the patient to this big-sized lesion.
