Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

It is not a dilemma anymore whether our social consciousness and everyday social exchanges are entangled or not. The time is now more ripe for interdisciplinarity and search for better metatheory. In between these struggles around us, this article aptly looked for the possibility of linearity between liberty and political economy. As far as I can understand and my training in psychology allows, I feel this article is a original attempt to address the inherent duality between action and idealism. The political economy is based on sociocultural context, dominant or prevalent perspective and discourses emanating from various institutions and ofcourse intergroup relations. If these factors can have some space in the discussion or conclusion, I believe the questions related to duality of action and thought may better be nourished. Overall, I look forward to read this article in its final form on Qeios.
