Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

1-Relevance and Importance: The research addresses a crucial issue of hate incidents in higher education, a topic that is highly relevant and important for creating a safe and inclusive environment within universities.

2-Sample Size and Representation: The study boasts a large sample size (2,265 respondents) covering both staff and students, enhancing the comprehensiveness of the findings. However, the representativeness of the sample is acknowledged as a potential limitation.

3-Inclusion of Comparative Element: The inclusion of a comparative study with a neighboring university adds depth to the research, providing insights into potential variations across institutions.

4-Thorough Research Design: The research design is well-structured, with clear research questions, a robust survey methodology, and a focus on understanding both the extent and reporting patterns of hate incidents.

5-Thematic Analysis: The inclusion of a thematic analysis of open-ended responses enriches the study by capturing qualitative data and providing a more nuanced understanding of participants' experiences.
