

Review of: "Neuropsychanalysis and Dual-Aspect Monism"

Consuelo C. Casula

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

It is an honest article that accurately argues the case regarding the scruple necessary to respect dual-aspect monism as a feature of psychoanalysis. With the first case on Brain connectivity the author points out that anatomical connectivity and actual connectivity cannot be used to explain consciousness and mental phenomena.

With the second case on Affect the author suggests that neuropsychanalysts should put more effort into the risk of materialism or reductionism.

In the conclusions, the author is clear in calling for more studies on the mind-body relationship to develop an epistemology that improves mental health by understanding the phenomenology of human experience.