Thank you very much for your invitation to review for Qeios.

It is a great effort from the authors to write about tomatoes, as it's a compulsive item in our food, especially in Asia.

But I am confused: is it a research article, a review article, or just an introductory essay?

A lot of varieties are grown and eaten worldwide. Some are just eaten as fruit, and some are added to salads, cooked dishes (curries), or processed into juice, puree, paste, etc. Information about that is missing here.

The nutritional profile mentioned at the end seems to be pasted from somewhere without a reference.

In all, only one reference is quoted for the health benefits. Adding more references will improve the support for that benefit.

The abstract and conclusion are almost the same. The abstract should emphasize the need for this article, and the conclusion should conclude the whole findings about tomatoes.

Regards,
