

Review of: "Menschenbild: An Important Factor for our Identity"

Eugénio Lopes

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

I find the topic of the article very interesting. Likewise, I think the article is formally well-structured and presents clear and understandable language.

However, methodologically speaking, I think that the article would gain more consistency if it went beyond the description of concepts and arguments.

In the same way, I think the article could answer some questions that the reader can formulate during the reading, such as: can one speak of human nature independently of any ideology? Likewise, are there immutable and perennial values, thus avoiding any relativism?

In this sense, I think the ideas set out in the article could be compared with other thinkers and currents of thought.
