This article is quite interesting, but there are several points that can be used as considerations to complete the detailed presentation of this article.

- In the abstract it is not clear what the problem is with your research locus and what the urgency is so that this research must be carried out.
- In the introductory chapter, because your reader is an international reader, you are expected to write the name of the province and country when presenting data such as Kebumen, Situbondo and others.
- In table 1 it is recommended that at each stage it is also written down how many people are involved in the activities at each stage of the process.
- Explain in more detail the sampling technique you used so you can determine the number of samples, and how you chose them and why?
- Explain in more detail what instruments you use? What is the content of each data collection instrument that you use? how to prepare the instrument and who collects research data using the instrument.
- It is recommended, because the subjects of your research are humans and one of them is children, it is best to convey whether you have approval from the research ethics committee regarding the research you have conducted, including whether there is informed consent for all your research subjects, this should be conveyed in the methods chapter.
- Explain in more detail why you chose seventh-grade students of junior high school for your research subject.
- Explain in more detail the results in tables 4, 5 and 7, how to validate the results or get a validation score for each point in the ESD-integrated coastal conservation edukit.
- Because your readers are international readers, it is highly recommended in the discussion chapter to discuss or compare similar products in various countries so that it can be more interesting for international readers to read this article.
- The advice given should be narrated more specifically, making it clear who is doing what so that it can be understood more clearly by the reader.
