

Review of: "How many papers are published each week reporting on trials of interventions involving behavioural aspects of health?"

D Sofyan

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

Overall, this paper is good, can provide information to readers, and deserves to be quoted by future researchers who are interested in the health sector, especially interventions that involve aspects of health behavior.

The use of the PubMed database is very logical for searching metadata related to health research. However, why not use the Scopus or Web of Science databases which are the largest and most impactful databases of abstracts, and almost all articles go through a rigorous review process. determined by the author will get high-quality articles and may be able to provide more comprehensive information.