Overall, the article is definitely a piece worth publishing, where it discusses major issues and their relation to entrepreneurship in a country that is suffering a lot as a result of corruption and bad governance. However, there is a need to hone down the relationship between the three main factors introduced and surveyed throughout the article. As in, there was an extent of disconnection between radicalization & entrepreneurship, corruption & entrepreneurship, and corruption & radicalization. The methodology and data used were very good, but the authors can make more use of the collected data, that could be prevalent in their use of creating correlation between the different demographic data and the three main concepts. Also, it could be helpful if a connection is drawn on the aid from different international NGOs the government gets to promote entrepreneurship and how the population is receiving it and how the reality differs from publicized/received aids, in addition to, the existence of supervision and regulatory authorities to monitor the aids provided to the government to promote entrepreneurship.
