

Review of: "Foucault 40 years later – an intimate history"

Marcelo Pakman

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

I found that this original intertwining of Foucault's work with your life in this article, long as it is, reads like a prelude for a forthcoming book. The article left me wanting to know more about your life in those periods in which Foucault was doing something to you before you could reflect about his work explicitly, which for me is the usual way in which important things affect us. I'd like to know more, for instance, about the emotions you mentioned in different periods. But a book would also make explicit the missing links between Foucault's themes and concepts and other concepts you connect them with. It would take us by our hand to accompany us in that process of elaboration and complete the missing links. As it is, both regarding your life and your elaborations, it feels as having illuminated something briefly with a beam of light, leaving me again in the dark and wanting. I hope this forthcoming book is not only my wishful thinking.