I like the content of this article very much and it certainly provides in depth discussion of many philosophical arguments as to human existence. My present issue is the way it is expressed and the length of sentences. For example: Might not the values and meaning that exist in the universe and are brought to it through the minds and activities of human beings (and perhaps other sentient beings) constitute the raison d'etre (and perhaps even as the cause of the cosmos)? This 42 word sentence could be shortened to under half the length.

"Might universal values and meanings of sentient beings be the reason and serve as the cosmos cause?" Reading the article, the length of sentences and use of unnecessary qualifiers made it a struggle to process the information at times. Using "and" to start a sentence breaks the flow as this is a connective within a linguistic structure. This is an important issue, as today people prefer visual rather than verbal images for processing meaning. Thanks for the interesting, thought provoking content.
