A very interesting article, which, although it deals with a global problem that many countries suffered due to the COVID-19 pandemic, focuses on the moral damage suffered by the professionals in white coats who were like true warriors trying to mitigate the effects caused. We know that hospitals were overcrowded and that there were no spaces available for many patients, in addition to the frustration of not being able to offer medication or a vaccine, among other important factors that had a strong impact on the morale of medical staff.

Perhaps the only thing I would dare to comment on is the future proposal of immediate solutions to foresee this type of scenario and establish appropriate measures or strategies to minimize the risks to health professionals.
