Dear Editor,

Although the subject of the study may be considered a worthwhile practical problem to be investigated and solved, the lack of innovation in the chosen approach is remarkably obvious. There is no specific scientific contribution to the subject. The authors should enhance the clarity of the paper's contribution by incorporating recent and pertinent articles into the introductory section and discussing their contributions in relation to those presented in the papers.

The paper lacks a description of related works as well as a state of the art of research, including the methods used in the literature, making the originality and soundness of the research work not clear.

The research gap and motivation should be clarified in the introduction section. Authors should begin with the problem, the gap, then propose the research question, and just after that say what they want to do to address that. Where is the gap? And you should clearly explain why it is a gap. Once again, if you say that it is a gap, then try to build a case for the gap.

The subdivisions of the Materials and Methods section are not clear; they should be rearranged and numbered.

The methodology used is not clear. It is better to include a flowchart showing the methodology of the study.
