The article discusses the roots of the emergence and construction process of a profession: social work. The entire evolution described is very interesting and well informed, making the article a very interesting and pertinent text and, in some ways, a fascinating read.

However, I believe it would have been important if the author had presented the methodology he followed in the investigation in a separate chapter. It refers to a qualitative methodology, it involves conducting interviews, but we are left with a lack of information regarding the number of interviewees, the reasons underlying the choice of subjects, and the script and nature of the interview itself. I am sure that the article would gain in its scientific relevance if more attention were paid to these aspects.
