Dear colleague,

Congratulations on your work. It is appreciated to be able to share cases with low prevalence that can help the rest of the scientific community improve clinical practice.

Nothing to say in the comments about the entity presented by the patient or in the comments about the etiology.

I would like a clarification to be made: does it take 5 days to decide the patient's surgical indication? If the patient has a history of cholecystectomy, the first option would be to suspect adhesions and administer gastrografen, right? What is the justification for not doing it? I think it would also help to know why a different management is chosen.

Thanks and congratulations.
