Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

Strengths:

The article has a strong foundation and addresses a highly relevant and important topic, providing in-depth insights into the impact of the COVID-19 pandemic on the lives of indigenous communities in Buru, focusing on their dependence on nature and gender division of labor. The qualitative methods used add significant depth to the analysis and findings.

Advantages:

The topic is highly relevant and urgent in the context of the pandemic. The use of qualitative methods, including interviews and direct observations, significantly enhances the depth of the analysis. The article effectively integrates relevant social and economic theories and provides an in-depth discussion of the pandemic's impact on indigenous communities.

Areas for Improvement:

Some sections contain long paragraphs and complex sentences that could be simplified. The explanation of data collection and analysis techniques needs to be more detailed. Theoretical explanations could be more concise and directly focused on the main points. More concrete examples from the collected data are needed to support the findings. The conclusion should include more specific policy implications and actionable plans.

Final Assessment:

Overall, the article has a strong foundation and addresses a highly important topic. With improvements in structure, more detailed methodology, use of theory, inclusion of concrete examples, and strengthening of the conclusion, this paper could become a very valuable contribution to the literature on the impact of the pandemic on indigenous communities. The efforts made are commendable and worthy of recognition, and with the suggested enhancements, the quality of this paper can be significantly improved.
