Overall the theme of research is very interesting as it raises important and interesting questions about women's perception of crime and safety in major cities in India . Although, many elements in the research are missing which are needed to be addressed before publication. The researcher did not clear what is the main argument of the research is. He/she didn't mention the international cases studies regarding how the developed world is coping with fear of crime and how their urban design is minimizing the women's fear.

The methodology seems to be very basic and general. Researcher didn't mentioned the reason of selecting the sampling technique. Cite some major crime rate from NCRB report. Analysis should be more detailed by using different statistical techniques and analysis based on surveys.

The relationship between crime and urban design in context of paper is missing. Based on field surveys, interviews of concerned officials and how developed countries are dealing with it, a separate heading of recommendations should be made.
