

Review of: "Hard problems in the philosophy of mind"

Elisa Galgut<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> University of Cape Town

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

The article covers a lot of ground regarding the mind-body debate, and provides a nice overview of the issues. However, it does not offer a new contribution to this issue. It can be philosophically naive at times, and I would suggest that the author focus his / her argument on a specific issue, rather than provide an overview of the issues. This would narrow the argument and force the author to examine the problems more carefully. So although I think that the paper does provide some good summaries of the core issues in the mind-body debate, it is not of the standard one would expect of a philosophy journal.