

Review of: "Emergent Prefigurative Politics and Social Psychological Processes: A Systematic Review and Research Agenda"

Celso Cancela Outeda<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> University of Vigo

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

The review article provides a stimulating perspective on a crucial topic in academia.

The article follows a coherent approach and structure. Overall, it adopts a positive tone.

It provides a detailed description of the empirical research/literature on the topic and is useful for initiating future research.

The objectives are clear and specific, providing a clear direction for the research. The proposed strategy shows a remarkable consistency and is precisely articulated, promising a rigorous and detailed exploration of the topic in question. It also refers to the method (PRISMA) used and the search strategy followed.

A noteworthy aspect of the review is the identification of a significant gap in the academic literature.

The omission of psychological underpinnings in studies on political prefiguration is a relevant finding because it provides an opportunity to expand our knowledge on the topic and to explore new dimensions at the intersection between psychology and politics.

The article invites researchers to address this gap, while offering suggestive theoretical frameworks (ethnographic and longitudinal methods, case study techniques that can examine change processes over time) that can serve as starting points for innovative research.