The article is interesting and contains a vital proposal for tertiary education that is also applicable at primary and secondary level. In many non-Christian or postmodernist countries, it requires the establishment of schools represent a Christian worldview and witness.

As someone who writes in English although it is not my mother tongue, I understand the challenges of addressing oneself in a language you are not using every day. The difficulty is to think in the other language in order to express oneself cogently. My biggest concern with this paper is that the language use is unfriendly, making it difficult for readers to follow the important argument.

The spelling of English words is not a problem. The challenge is the construction of sentences. For that reason, may I propose that the authors contact an informed user using English as mother tongue to evaluate the paper. In many instances, sentences are not complete or the thought of the argument is not clear. In cooperation with the respective authors this language expert can then restate some sentences to ensure its readability and consistency of thought.

It might also be helpful to utilise more subheadings to make it easier to follow the argument. It will also assist the authors to work more systematically in presenting the argument.

For the rest, I think the article will make an important contribution to the issue of Christian education. May I congratulate its authors on an excellent, relevant and timely paper!
